NOMENCLATURE OF ENGLISH & COMMUNICATIONS
DEPARTMENT, AND APPLIED ARTS AND COMMUNICATIONS

Requests have been received from both departments and their respective divisions that the confusion resulting from joint possession of the work "communications" be resolved.

Policy statement B4.1 regarding mandatory program content defines communications as basic skills of reading, writing, listening and reporting.

This policy is college-wide in significance, and the responsibility for carrying out the instruction involved has been assigned to the present English and Communications Department. With this responsibility the College has hired faculty with this explicit kind of instruction in mind.

Just as clearly the present department of Arts & Communications, has been assigned the responsibility for program development (as and when it occurs) in the field of technologically-related communications.

We are all aware of the significance of the term communications in the areas of linguistics, some branches of mathematics, and the social sciences. It is clear that the present ambiguity is harmful and tends to exacerbate an area in which there is inherent conflict, which will always be with us.

I have contemplated 3 alternatives:

- a) Eliminate the term from department nomenclature.
- b) Assign the word communications to one department.
- c) Attach a qualifying adjective that confirms present institutional activities, and short term intentions.

I have selected alternative 3. Henceforth, the names of the departments involved will be:

- a) The Department of English and Basic Communications
- b) The Department of Arts and Media Communications.

GUIDE DOGS

Guide dogs are used by blind people to act as "eyes", allowing the blind person the opportunity to freely move around. Seeing eye dogs are trained to ignore all activities except those which affect the safety of the owner. While a guide dog is in harness, it is "working" and should not be petted or played with. Feel free to greet a blind person with a guide dog, but avoid the urge to pet the dog.
